Ok. Thanks for summarizing Dad's illogical thinking. It will be good for him to spin for a little bit and get good and scared. At some point, there will be emergency calls for damage control.

I will do some legal consultations on my own to understand legal options when the time comes. Id like to avoid being in a reactive mode.

I am puzzled by this message, hence my texts to you last evening.

Dad basically wants the following sequence:

- * He wants the public guardianship "cancelled" on the premise that a Living Will takes care of all matters sufficiently.
- * He wants the Living Will to be revocable. (This is why he got upset when I told him that if he revokes the POA part of the Living Will, he'll be reverted back to a public guardianship.)
- * To the extent he is controlled by a POA, he wants complete control over whoever is doing the POA.
- * He wants to be the one who revises the Living Will in such a way as to work around the public guardianship.

This is what I'd suggest to you. I think researching POA won't be a good use of your time. Instead, let him learn about the public guardianship via his own experience and lawyer. Both will consume his assets, but that will be his price to pay for learning the hard way.

After he suffers financially, maybe he will ask us for help. At that point he will be realistic about what he can ask of us.

But I think he won't do that. His health is declining so fast that I doubt he will last more than a year or two.

Huy,

I will set up a 30-minute legal consultation setup through my work just to better understand how to proceed with Dad's Will and trust setup for POA and springing trusteeship. If they make a referral, my coverage offers 25% off.

Jeff's work has more generous coverage. Below are the relevant items. I will set up a consultation also, and see if they can, at minimum, setup a durable, general POA document.
