

Subject: Re: Release of Dad's cell line
From: Hien Cao <hcaosc@gmail.com>
Date: 7/21/2023, 9:19 PM
To: Huy Cao <mark.cao@gmail.com>
CC: Hanh Cao Yu <hanhcaoyu@gmail.com>

I talked with T-Mobile. The number has been released.

On Jul 21, 2023, at 8:31 AM, Mark Cao <mark.cao@gmail.com> wrote:

Hien,

Please release (714) 280-6153 so that I can transfer it to my account, per my responsibility to handle his accounts.

There is a tricky thing about doing this, though. Jessica claimed to Chu Y that Dad sent some sort of "sensitive" or incriminating texts to her. Therefore, try to download as much of the call and text history as you can (but I believe it goes back only 18 months). Only after that, please release the line. Once the number is transferred to my account, T-Mobile tells me I cannot access past metadata.

After you release the line, I assume you want the iPhone back. I will mail that to you.

I asked Dad whether he ever texted Jessica. He said no on two different occasions.

Yesterday, I then explicitly said to him, "Jessica says you sent some sort of bad texts to her." He replied angrily, "She is a liar."

The metadata of his texts will help prove she manufactured texts. Later, for court use, I will ask T-Mobile for specific metadata (which can go back seven years). But having informal logs now should help to determine if she's making up texts.

Chu Y is now on my shit list. He expected me to believe Jessica's version of the story and drop the lawsuit, or be scared of a counterclaim. But I simply told him, Let's see what she has for evidence when discovery is performed. Chu Y spoke slowly when talking about "sensitive" things that will ruin Dad's reputation. Frankly I don't care, I can sniff out a liar.

Thanks,
Huy